Human Values & Professional Ethics

Institutional Values:

An ideal institution fosters the overall development of individuals, encompassing both their intellectual and emotional growth. Intellectual development strengthens observation, knowledge, intelligence, and judgment, while emotional development nurtures virtues like purity of mind and soul (Satva), compassion (Karuna), and peace (Shanti). These values create a balanced institution that operates in harmony with its surroundings. Core human values such as honesty, courage, compassion, justice, and fairness play a crucial role in professional conduct. These qualities define a person's character and guide them toward realizing their full potential. A person with strong virtues naturally upholds ethical principles.

Honesty manifests in truthfulness and trustworthiness. Courage, as Aristotle noted, is fundamental because it supports all other virtues by enabling individuals to take on challenges. Justice and fairness ensure that people receive equitable treatment, reinforcing the idea that favoritism and discrimination are both unethical. Compassion, which embodies love and kindness, fosters positive relationships among colleagues and within groups.

To promote ethical behavior and workplace harmony, these virtues must be actively practiced. Peace is fundamental in any institution, starting from the individual and extending to the organization and society. Achieving peace requires:

- Self-discipline
- Positive thinking
- Creativity
- Happiness
- Physical well-being

Professional Ethics in Teaching:

Education aims to instill values, skills, and attitudes that benefit society. It has always been grounded in principles that support physical, intellectual, moral, and spiritual growth. By awakening an individual's ability to recognize truth, duty, and goodness, education shapes responsible and compassionate citizens. This process depends on the commitment of both teachers and parents, who must work together selflessly for the student's development.

Teachers should communicate with parents about a child's temperament, challenges, and abilities, fostering mutual trust. Likewise, parents should have confidence that educators provide their children with the right guidance to become intelligent, sensitive, and responsible individuals. Teachers must treat all students equally, regardless of their socioeconomic background, religion, or social status. Additionally, accepting gifts from parents is generally considered unethical.

Commitment to teaching should be voluntary, driven by passion rather than external pressures or personal gain. Educators should uphold high professional standards and support one another in maintaining integrity within their profession.

Respect

Showing respect to teachers and classmates is essential for fostering positive interpersonal relationships. Individuals are encouraged to treat others the way they wish to be treated, instilling a sense of mutual respect and understanding.

Integrity

When students commit to honesty, they cultivate a strong work ethic and strive for success. The integrity they develop during their education will shape their professional reputation and contribute to their future accomplishments and aspirations.
